IMPORTANT FROM THE URUGUAY.

BATTLE OF CORRALITO.

SIEGE OF SORIANO.

THREE DAYS' FIGHTING.

Yesterday the steamer from the Uruguay brought us numerous passengers from both banks of the river. Parties from Entre Rios state that if the National Government wishes to conclude the war in that province it has nothing to do but pay their troops regularly, and all Lopez Jordan's men will at once desert and join the National banner—it is a mere question of paying the men or not.

From the Bandal Oriental we have full accounts of the last battles with Caraballo, which have undergone such various versions, but the full import of which we now arrive at.

A resident on one of the estancias hard by the battle field has favoured us with the following account of the fight—

On last Tuesday the vanguard of Caraballo passed the once smiling town of Mercedes taking the high road which leads to Montevideo, the rest of Caraballo's army following. On Wednesday at sundown Caraballo's army encamped at the Corralito. When Caraballo passed Mercedes he had about 1600 men all told, various bullock carts, four guns, about 5000 horses. He received reinforcements, 130 infantry from Montevideo, 300 light cavalry scraped together by the Jefes de departamentos, and about 200 more collected at the different pulperias and estancias, giving him a force in all of say 2200 men, of which some 600 were infantry and the rest cavalry.

On Wednesday, the same day, Medina's vanguard came up at the Corralito and posted themselves there to stop the advance of Caraballo; all that day was passed in small skirmishes, and Caraballo prepared for a decisive fight on the following morning. During the night Aparicio and Medina brought up their forces very quietly, and at dawn the next day Caraballo opened the fight, secure of gaining an easy victory. Col. Caraballo, who commanded the vanguard, marched along the high road, supported by strong divisions of cavalry on both flanks, but before a shot was fired large columns of cavalry under the leadership of Medina charged up on the left wing, whilst on the opposite side Aparicio with about one thousand well mounted troopers advanced with such rapidity as almost to threaten Caraballo's rear. The fight can hardly be said to have become general, inasmuch as Caraballo's left wing at once cleared out, taking the whole 'caballada' with them, and the right wing, appearing to go after them, cleared out also.

The whole of Caraballo's fine army having thus decamped with the exception of the infantry under Col. Caraballo, a regular set-to fight between Blancos and Colorados began. The Blancos resting behind the large boulders or stones which form the corral, and which has given the place its name, held their ground very manfully, and with the aid of four small pieces conveniently posted, kept one side of the field clear, but nothing could withstand the enthusiasm of the Blancos when they saw Caraballo's whole cavalry force clearing out, and clearing out with the horses of their whole army. Aparicio sword in hand charged up to the very bullock carts, seized the baggage and about 50 'chinas' (native women); meanwhile, Caraballo perceiving from his elevated position on the high stones of the Corralito, called on his men to make an effort. Sword in hand the little band of Colorados rushed to the rescue of the bullock carts, and now on one portion of the field the battle became general. The Blancos charged up to the very bayonet point, but again the superiority of infantry over cavalry was apparent; the fight, if it is to be called so, lasted the whole day, the Blanco cavalry and the Colorado infantry holding their ground amazingly well. Moyano at the head of one of the squares charged the Blancos in the vicinity of an old ditch; they drove back the enemy, and in following up the advantage fell into the ditch and into great disorder. Aparicio perceiving this ordered a regiment of Fray Bentos lancers to charge the Colorados before they had time to form in square, and indeed had this been well and quickly carried out, it would have decided the day; but the horses of the Blancos refused to jump the ditch, meanwhile the guns from the Corralito opened fire, and then ensued a scene which would baffle even a Napoleon to describe; the Colorados crawling as best they could out of the ditch, and the Blanco cavalry baulked by the ditch and demoralized by the fire from the rocks, wheeled round and galloped pell mell towards the once splendid estancia of S. r. Mallmann.

That evening Aparicio offered terms to Caraballo, viz. that the officers be all pardoned and allowed to leave the country, and the men at once change sides and join the Blancos. It was all arranged; Aparicio and Caraballo had a personal interview which lasted two hours. Maté and paper cigars were supplied, and when breaking up the conference they exchanged 'rebenques'. Aparicio returned to his camp and talked the matter over with Medina. In the night, however, Caraballo struck his tents and marched off; and what was the surprize of the Blancos to find next morning that the whole force of the Colorados had evaporated. Aparicio was furious, he called out his men and sent forces in all directions to hunt them up. That day the Blancos came up with the Colorados entering Soriano, here a fight and a bloody fight ensued, and the Colorados made good their retreat. On Saturday they fought, retreated and embarked; the mortality amongst the Blancos is said to have been very severe. The Colorados made good their escape to the Island of Lobos at the mouth of the Rio Negro, from whence the remnant of Caraballo's once fine army embarked in the Rio Uruguay, Coquimbo, and Chanar, for Paysanda, where it is to be supposed the General and his men will be next heard of.

TERRIBLE NEWS FROM PARAGUAY.

A ROW BY THE FOREIGNERS.

FEARFUL STREET-FIGHTING.

Yesterday telegrams were received in town, giving the following account of a dreadful riot in the streets of Asuncion, the result being over 50 men killed and wounded.

We give a translation of the telegram to the Tribuna announcing this sad affair.

Parana, Sept. 3, 1870.

The Guauguay has just anchored. She brings the following account of a bloody riot in Asuncion.

One of the papers published an account of the murder of a Paraguayan woman, accusing an Italian as being the perpetrator. Upon this 500 Italians armed themselves with rifles, attacked the office of the paper, murdered the printers, and set fire to the premises.

The Government asked the Argentine troops to suppress the riot, as the Italians went towards the Government House, shouting 'Down with the Government!' A fearful fight then ensued between the Italians and the Paraguayan and Argentine troops, commanded by Gen. Vedia. The fight lasted for two hours, fifty men on both sides being killed and wounded. An aide-de-camp of General Vedia was killed.

The Argentine troops took 250 Italian prisoners, and dispersed the rest. The citizens are in a state of wild excitement at such a fight taking place in the city.

THE CORDILLERA TRAGEDY.

The Supreme Court of Chile has refused the demand of the Argentine Government to deliver up the bandits who murdered three or four of Mr. Jameson's party last December at the Paramillo pass on the Andes. The Chilean papers just to hand mention the trial of the prisoners has begun, but throws out hints that they will not be executed although identified by Mr. Jameson, and one of them having even confessed the crime. It may be remembered that the first account of this horrible occurrence published in Buenos Ayres was given us by an Englishman who met Ferrari and his gang near the Cumbre the night before the murder, and who had a very narrow escape for his life. He described Ferrari as a man of plausible manners, muscular frame, and cunning aspect, and in the course of conversation Ferrari told him that he owned some mines in the neighborhood whither he was going with his men.

The Chilean papers give the following statement, with some details not hitherto known:

To-day the trial begins of the brigands who committed the murders in the Cordillera on the 3rd December 1869. The circumstances which have come to light are the following—

On the night of Nov. 29th the Governor of Los Andes was advised by an Argentine merchant who happened to be passing through that town that an Italian named Casimiro Ferrari was going to rob a merchant named Velazco who had started that day for Mendoza with a quantity of bar-silver, Ferrari (who was a noted brigand) having set out immediately after Velazco.

The Governor immediately despatched two policemen at midnight with orders for the Captain of the Resguardo at the Rio Colorado to seize Ferrari. It appears that for eight days previous Ferrari had been several times to the Rio Colorado, saying he had a silver mine in the neighborhood. On these occasions he had formed a friendship with the Captain of Resguardo, to whom he always spoke most enthusiastically of the Chileans and their generous hospitality to all foreigners. The Captain therefore treated the charge against Ferrari as a calumny, and wrote an answer to the Governor, that it could not be true, since Velazco had passed by the day before, and Ferrari was not yet come; he added, however, that he would arrest Ferrari on his arrival. Hereupon the Governor of Los Andes wrote back to the Captain of Resguardo not to molest Ferrari. The latter arrived two days later about nightfall, being accompanied by four or five men who passed on the far side of the road, while Ferrari himself entered the Resguardo for a moment, and then continued his journey.

On the night of Dec. 2nd the but called Paramillo de Las Cuevas, on the Argentine side of the Cordillera, was occupied by five ferocious, ill-looking men, under a leader who seemed of a better class of society: the latter was of fair complexion, tall and corpulent figure, and a red beard slightly grizzled. (It was here that Mr. N. N. and his two companions fell in with Ferrari and his gang, and providentially escaped by continuing their journey that night, while Ferrari waited for the richer booty he expected from San Juan). It seems there were some vagabonds also at Paramillo besides Ferrari's gang, and to these the brigand stated that some Argentine merchants were to pass that way next day, and that they must all join him and would then share in the booty. He then gave each man his place in the next day's attack.

Meantime the ill-fated Argentine travellers were sleeping a few leagues lower down, unconscious of the danger. At daybreak the bandits took up their position in the pass. At 6 a.m. the travellers Thomas Jameson, Marcos Antonio Bravo, and their peons Chirino, Morales and Lucero were quietly beginning the ascent. At 8 a.m. they reached a point of the Paramillo de Cuevas, where there is a sharp turn, Jameson and Bravo were foremost, quietly chatting as they rode together, when a voice suddenly shouted 'Halt!' Presently they saw, on looking around, two men standing above them. One of them was about 28 years of age, middle-size, dark complexion and close beard, apparently a Chilean. Just behind him stood Ferrari, who was pointing a double-barrelled fowling-piece at Jameson. The travellers were ordered to dismount and deliver up their arms; they were then taken back a few paces to the left and found themselves surrounded by brigands, who began to strip them on the edge of a precipice some 900 feet deep, while Ferrari gave orders to tie their hands. Jameson availed himself of a moment when the brigands were not observing him to pick up a gun that lay near him, and aimed at the man who had cried out 'halt'. It missed fire and the bandit rushed on him, when a hand-to-hand fight ensued on the edge of the precipice, in which Jameson succeeded in throwing his adversary over the brink. The other brigands, who had been busy rifling the baggage and tying the other prisoners, now ran towards Jameson to finish him, but he plunged over the precipice, rolling down to the edge of the stream below, and before he had quite regained consciousness he found another body roll down on him, which proved to be the boy Lucero, who soon hid himself in the rocks.

During this time the rest of Jameson's party were being butchered by the brigands on top. Jameson, on crossing the stream, was fired at by those above, and miraculously escaped a shower of balls and stones aimed at him. He threw himself into the water and was carried down by the stream about 600 yards, until the brigands gave up the chase as useless: he hid himself in a hole and slept for some hours, then pursued his way downwards till meeting some mule-drivers whom he joined, coming on to Los Andes. The boy, Lucero, who had also escaped, went back with some others and found the corpses of Morales and Chirino, with the rifled boxes lying about. (The corpse of Bravo had been thrown down a ravine and could not be recovered. He was murdered by Farias, whom Bravo's father had once saved from execution in San Juan.)

Ferrari and his band, after completing their crime, left the road, the Italian going towards Los Andes, and three of the others, Pedro Sosa, Wenceslao Gomez, and Tadeo Paves, arriving that night (3rd December) at 7 o'clock at the rancho of Arancibia on the Estancia Sauce. Paves had a cut in his forehead from having been thrown over the precipice by Jameson. Ferrari passed the Resguardo of Rio Colorado after nightfall, and told his friend the Captain that urgent business called him to Santiago. One of the clerks remarked he was excited.

When the news reached Los Andes the judge of First Instance at once ordered a Sumario to be drawn up of the occurrence. Two Argentines, named Domingo Pasten and Tomas Farias, suspected of having been engaged in it, were arrested. The declarations of Mr. Jameson and the boy Lucero were taken, and the latter picked out Farias among a batch of prisoners in jail, and on searching him a cloak and other articles belonging to the victims were found.

Farias said he had bought these things and brought a woman and 7 men to prove an alibi. As for Pasten it seems he presented himself voluntarily, and although he has been 4 times condemned for previous crimes he also will be set free.

Mr. Jameson after making his declaration continued his journey towards Valparaiso. At Llaillay, while they were weighing his luggage at the railway station word was given that a drunken Argentine was knocking about on a fine mule, offering to sell a handsome saddle and trappings. Jameson went to see him and at once recognized Paves, the bandit that he had thrown over the precipice. The authorities arrested him and sent him to Los Andes, where he confessed his part in the crime, but said Ferrari made him do it. He stated that Ferrari himself shot one of the victims with a revolver and the bandits finished the rest.

The police telegraphed to Santiago and Valparaiso to catch Ferrari but it was found he had stopped at the Hotel Lafayette and was gone, probably in one of the coasting steamers.

The Argentine Minister, D. Felix Frias, demanded the extradition of the criminals, the murders having been committed in Argentine territory. The Fiscal, however, opposed on the grounds that Paves is a Chilean and prays to be tried by the laws of his country, and that as regards Pasten and Farias there is no evidence against them.

Note.—This shows what a burlesque of justice prevails on the other side of the Andes too. Poor South America!

IMPORTANT TRIAL IN PARIS.

Paris, Aug. 22—2 p.m.—I have just returned from a most painful spectacle—the first trial by Court-martial here of the Prussian spy recently arrested. The trial was held in a building situated opposite the military prison, in the Rue Cheroche, Midi Faubourg St. Germain, and was conducted before the Second Council of War. M. Simonet, the Imperial Advocate, prosecuted.

At 12 o'clock the prisoner was escorted by 'gendarmes' and soldiers and introduced before the Court, which was composed of seven officers belonging to different branches of the service. In reply to questions from the President, the prisoner stated that his name was Karl Herdo, and that he was a native of Brandebourg, and a Lieutenant in the Fifty-fourth Regiment, forming a portion of the Third Prussian corps d'armée. The prisoner is a tall, handsome young man, small in frame, but of an intelligent appearance. He spoke French fluently, with a slight German accent. He is a man evidently belonging to the higher class of society, and justified the President's allusion to his distinguished manners. He preserved throughout the proceedings the self-possession which he has manifested since his arrest.

The prosecution produced no witnesses, the only evidence against the prisoner being the reports sent up by authorities at Gien, a small town on the banks of the Loire, where he was captured, in the act of taking notes and drawings. A revolver, a quantity of cartridges, a portfolio, a railway indicator, a carte de visite, and a portemonnaie, were found upon the prisoner when he was arrested. The Police Commissary reported the prisoner as possessing a minute knowledge of the country, and the relative strength of both armies. He had formed a calculation with regard to the strength of the French army, fixing the number of men at 283,000, and boasted that the Prussian army was nearly 900,000 strong. He also admitted that the French army was literally infested with Prussian spies. He came from London to Bordeaux, and from Bordeaux to Orleans, and so to Gien, where he confessed that he had no real business.

A letter from the Commandant of the Gendarmerie to his superior officer stated that the prisoner openly admitted that he was a spy sent by the Prussian Government, and that he had dispatched information by Switzerland and Belgium. He had also a correspondent in Paris. In the course of his examination by the President to-day, he denied all the above confessions, and declared that he was not engaged in any correspondence with the enemies of France, and that he only visited France on his way to establish himself in Switzerland. He further alleged that he had quitted the Prussian service four weeks before the declaration of war, and that all the letters he had written were familiar ones, addressed to his family—such as tourists ordinarily write. He explained his presence at Gien as arising from the fact that money was due to him there.

Upon hearing this statement, the Imperial Commissary called for a sentence of guilty from the Court, stating that it was time to rid France of spies by whom the enemy had been put into possession of facts highly important in the prosecution of the war. A young advocate defended the prisoner affirming that he was simply a hot-brained enthusiast, who in correspondence with his family, had given details regarding the route of the armies and a description of the river, already well known to the Prussian authorities.

After ten minutes' deliberation the tribunal agreed unanimously on the prisoner's culpability, and adjudged him to be visited with the punishment of death. The trial was over in less than two hours, and the prisoner will probably be shot on Wednesday.
