The picture drawn by Dr. Thorne is a very painful one. 'Terling,' he writes, 'was now completely panic-stricken, and the moral effect of the tolling of the church bell at the death and the funeral of the parishioners seemed so prejudicial to those who still remained unaffected that I thought it right to suggest to the vicar the immediate discontinuance of that ordinary custom...

Dr. Thorne calls the nuisance authority of Terling, which is the board of guardians, smartly to task. 'It must be seen,' says he, 'that this authority had entirely neglected its duty.'
