THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

One of the principal political reviews of Germany, the Grenzboten, of Leipzig, publishes a long and interesting essay on the International, from which the following is extracted:—

Up to 1868 communism was but the dream of a sect. Since the revolution agitation of 1848 it was found possible in London to unite these two elements: the hatred of eccentric natures to the existing state of things, and the instinctive and chimerical need of the working-classes to place themselves in the position of those who rule and enjoy in order to rule and enjoy in their turn.

It is evident that to attain the abolition of capitalist production it is necessary that the present social condition should perish with all the principles on which it rests. Karl Marx, who is a deep thinker, and who, up to a certain point, possesses practical ability, saw that there was but one means which could render the execution of his plan possible—a great war.

Thanks to the disorders which would have followed, to the employment of the soldiers, who are instruments of repression in the hands of the states of the present day, and to the stagnation of business, which propagates discontent with lightning speed, he thought that he could with his host possess himself of one or more of the great European states.

Had the working-men's revolution once triumphed on the Continent, the English operatives would soon have brought their about. It is a remarkable fact that Marx, in his book on capital, published a few years ago, but written by him long since, already spoke of the probable success of a revolution by operatives.

Speaking of the English operatives which has pervaded the English operatives since the American war, he made this comparison: As a war of independence waged by the American colonists had as a consequence the French revolution in the past century, so the expropriation of the possessors of capital. It may be remembered that at the end of 1866 Marx had taken advantage of the Austro-Prussian war to organize a rising of operatives if it had not come to an end so speedily. It is, however, certain, that Marx, foreseeing the Franco-German war, intended to profit by it on an extensive scale; but this time his projects were again disconcerted by the extreme rapidity of the victories of the German host.

Davis the Mammoth and numerous other ledges have been struck in the same district, all of which show unmistakable signs of richness both in silver and gold. There are about five hundred people already at the new town of Bradshaw, and the number is daily increasing by the arrival of parties from California and Nevada.

The people of Arizona are considerably excited on account of these developments, and soon expect the district will rival if not exceed Nevada in the field of bullion.
