THE UNIVERSITY SCANDAL.

It seems to us that in treating of this melancholy event some of our colleagues have overlooked the one great law of society which condemns suicide.

Here we have the case of a young man, in the morning of life, with brilliant prospects, of good family, fair abilities, beloved by his fellow-students, and esteemed by all who knew him.

Graduates of universities are, in some respects removed from ordinary temptations; the very habits of the class, we should say, exempt them from passions which it costs a crime to gratify.

We have the pleasure of knowing many of the University youths. As a class, they are young men of bright talents and good parts.

There is also a precocity of talent discernible in the Argentine youth rarely met with in Europe.

Our youths are taught classics, and physics, and science; but we should not now have to deplore the death of this young man, if the higher moral education was more attended to.

Even the very sorrows of the fellow students, taking shape as it has done in a protest, shows that they know not what they do.

There have said at such an act? And to his present race no resemblance to its ancestors? has civilization, that costume of human races, transformed as well as disguised us?

We proceed to Ernest Koehl's hotel in the main-street, which recalls a thousand associations of Fatherland.

The Germans are a wonderful people: you may call them phlegmatic or what you will, but Nature evidently intended them for colonists par excellence.

On Friday morning we left Port Alegre in the steamer Balastrea, the oldest on the line.

On Friday morning we left Port Alegre in the steamer Balastrea, the oldest on the line.

About 20 miles from Port Alegre, we passed the charming fazenda of Bento Cyro and higher up came to a place where they were making bricks.

It is a lovely moonlight evening, and a number of children are playing on a heap of shavings in the middle of the street, of which presently they make a bonfire, dancing round it with German cries and interjections.

The bell which summons the workmen to their labors, from the neighboring Gothic steeple, awoke me about sunrise.

Reflections proceeding from an alien and unaccustomed world, may be applied, in the measure of their adaptation, to passing wants, and appreciated according to their sense and intention.

It is, then, in this character of universal citizenship which affords no countenance save to that which is conformable to morality, and which is not in the least at variance with the ideas of all men.

The saw-mills were busily working, and the children going to school with books and bottles of milk.

As soon as the stately palm trees began to cast their evening shadows athwart the streets the casements are again thrown open, and the little households seem to breathe the cool air with enjoyment.

Some of the most interesting of these monuments are, as a procession of nine or ten couples, the men wearing white gloves, and the women in gala attire, came out of the Evangelical Chapel, having just registered the vows of a bride and bridegroom.

Plunged in the most superstitious liberalism, we embrace an extreme which proclaims to a boy that he is the sole arbiter of his existence.

Even in the hurried consideration of this melancholy topic, more than once we have been stopped by an emotion. What would Argentine forefathers have said at such an act?

It may be remembered that some months ago, as the best solution of what is termed the Paraguayan riddle, we suggested that Paraguay should join this Republic.

I have learned a good deal about the colonies from Mr. Curtius, editor of Der Bote, and Mr. Phillip Leopold Matze, which will form the subject of a separate chapter.

The effects of the revolutionary ferment in Guatemala have not yet subsided. Political troubles still continue.

The people received the President with every demonstration of sympathy and respect.

About the time the steamship Salvador was ready to leave the port of Anapala, Honduras, a report had reached the place that a large party of Indians were coming down from Salvador to take possession of the town.

is inseparably linked with the fulfilment of public duty. Thus the right of general welfare is legitimate; the right of the sovereignty of the people; the sharing in the benefits of the progress, imposes upon each and every citizen duty of contributing towards it by a thoughtful, active co-operation in the selection of idoneous persons for the various offices, and the discharge of those offices.

And here another rule suggests itself, namely, amongst us the "principio de autoridad," a law which I assuredly shall not call in question, and which we must not only acknowledge, but in practice, enforce and apply upon every party in the State, simultaneously with its duty to power.

It is, then, in this character of universal citizenship which affords no countenance save to that which is conformable to morality, and which is not in the least at variance with the ideas of all men.
