2. Any member can have his house built by the society according to his ideas, taking shares in the society equivalent to the declared value.

3. The houses will pay a monthly rental based on a fixed rate of interest on the original cost.

4. At the expiration of the six years the society will be wound up and net profits divided amongst the shareholders, the houses remaining the property of the builders.

5. Shareholders can withdraw, at fixed notice, their instalments, if it is preferred to constitute the society as a perpetual one, then—

1. The society will build houses, first offering them to the shareholders to rent, and if they refuse, to the public.

2. A monthly rental based on a fixed rate of interest on the outlay will be made.

3. A yearly dividend, as the profits may allow, will be declared and paid to the shareholders.

I think it needless for me at present to add more. I now leave the matter for the public to discuss, and trust that each one will give the scheme the ventilation it demands.

I am, dear Sirs, Faithfully and obliged, Yours, HENRY S. CLOSE.

Only the other day there appeared a new novel bearing the title—a title well known to magazine readers—"Lord Kilgobbin." To this volume there was a dedication which ran thus:

"To the memory of one whose companionship made the happiness of a long life, and whose loss has made me hopeless, I dedicate these volumes, written in breaking health and broken spirits."

The inexpressible sadness of this melancholy work touched the reader all the more deeply when he remembered who had written it. It issued from the pen of the once gay, brilliant, mercurial C. Lever.

What a wonderful world of romance it is that which Lever introduced the reading world! What spirits, what constitutions, what luck, his heroes had! What hunts they rode, what duels they fought, what dangers by flood and field they passed through!

Then his heroines, how fair and fearless were those ladies of romance! What a fairland was Irish society as painted by Charles Lever! There were the old gentlemen who scorned to pay a debt and lived in their grand mansions protected by a feudal tenantry from duns and bailiffs.

There were the young gentlemen fighting duels, carrying off heroines, leaping six-bar gates, "frinking, drinking, never thinking," like the heroes of the old ballad.

ED. NOTE.—The above statement confirms our figures on Canada: we stated the total trade at 130 millions $ or 26 millions sterling (1868), and should not be surprised to find that it has increased notably since then.
