general approbation as our former In our first article we endeavored to give the reasons for our belief that the main cause of our present crisis was the absorption by the Government, for its loans bearing a high rate of interest, of the floating capital of the country; and in our second we did our best to explain the manner in which our bankers have, either by forgetfulness or ignorance of the elements of political economy and the principles of banking, succeeded in aggravating the effects of the storm which has been gathering around us for some time past. While distinctly avowing the absence on our part of any intention to hostilize the banks, we made so bold as to indicate the course which in our humble conception would tend to diminish the crisis, inspire confidence, assist commerce and promote the interests of the said institutions.
